

PRAGUE

My Review

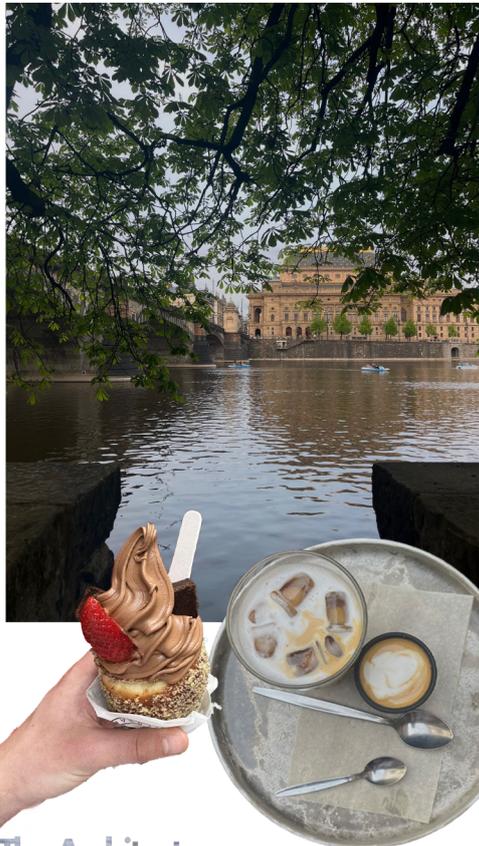

After a 17 mile walk we stumble across a park, filled with people catching up at the end of the day, the other side of this massive park seemed to be a mainly residential area except from one shop, the stationary shop of the year, papelote. after a bit of research, i discovered that the park was big in the skateboarding scene, with people of all ages trying to skate off what seemed to be marble.

The gardens by the government area were open to the public - the fountains even had fish. for this walk we went to a european supermarket - i would say this is the best cultural experience to have abroad. the gluten free section was incredible and the meal deal section showed the amazing quality of life.

Other highlights: the worlds narrowest street - personally i would say theres a narrower street in both and although the light is good it seemed like a tourist trap. the bookshop - genguinly had thousands of books and was probably a safety hazard but a very cool place none the less. The public transport was a great example of what a walkable city can be - with trams, bikes and roads dedicated to pedestrians.

Special Mentions.
SuperTramp cafe
Gluten free funnel cake

The Architecture.

the astronomical clock - i would say although its pretty, the gothic looking church next to it was way cooler. the castle - although the castle was impressive, personally i found the surrounding buildings more intriguing - the grandness of the area mixed with the humbleness of the materials (painted plaster juxtaposing with the stone opposite), i felt, showed a more realistic and habited side to such an important area of prague. however the addition of the starbucks next to the church was both confusing and cool
